Such secretions are useful as a) pharmaceutical agents, which are often formulated in such a way as to permit their administration via oral, nasal, topical, pulmonary, sublingual, or other route, as well as b) environmental metabolites or “cleansing agents” intended to cleanse a surface (e.g., the skin) or environment (e.g., the air) from undesirable foreign materials. Several methods have been used to recover such target secretions or secreted polypeptides. One such method entails isolating secretions or secreted polypeptides from a base material containing such secretions or secreted polypeptides. The isolated secretions or secreted polypeptides are then often formulated into other pharmaceutical, environmental, or industrial compositions. In some instances, a base material containing the secretions or secreted polypeptides of interest is processed to remove the secretions or secreted polypeptides so as to obtain the secretions or secreted polypeptides in isolation. This isolation may be achieved through processes such as gel filtration, gel electrophoresis, chromatographic processes, as well as other known techniques. However, such processes often require a mechanical component and are not well suited to processes where the secretions or secreted polypeptides are biologically derived. Another method for isolating the secretions or secreted polypeptides is by the formation of the secretions or secreted polypeptides into a composition with a solid matrix. For example, such a solid matrix could comprise polysaccharide beads, polymeric agarose, polyacrylamide, polymethacrylamide, polystyrene, polytetrafluoroethylene, polyvinylidene fluoride, polyurethane, cellulosic, or other types of polymers. However, the secreted polypeptides could be incorporated into such polymers within hydrogels (which are polymeric networks that contain an aqueous solution), hydrophilic polymers, hydrophobic polymers, or other types of polymers. The inclusion of the secreted polypeptides within the solid matrix forms
